Landlord Behaviour Is Not Luxury Living?
As soon as I realised that I was moving out in October I went into a frenzy trying to find apartments and houses available for rent. I must admit that it wasn't easy finding that perfect housing for me and my home staff, who would be moving in later this year. The feeling of failing in my search was like being on a rollercoaster and being unable to brake on the rollercoaster's curve. Every day that passed me by made me feel like my housing search was a failure, as I was unsure as to how I would manage to rent another place. In short, I had gone from great happiness over finally finding a place which has vacant mojo, to a state of intense stress over where I would end up in the year. Though I can now begin to relax a little, as I've finally found a place which has vacant mojo, I have begun to wonder if the anxiety that I experienced is something that common landlords feel or were comfortable in accepting. I realized that it is something that is not an uncommon feeling. For example, anxiety hits me when I check the latest in my bank balance, and the average average balance is less than I anticipated and does not leave me in a position to ease the expense on my monthly expenses. An example of real life anxiety was the time I was hunting for housing and I was crossing my fingers to see that my prospects were in my favor. I was careless with my commitment and had issues with my credit score, which is something I thought would not hinder my search. This anxiety was like the feeling of biting into a piece of plastic; it was sticky to the touch, and I couldn't get a good grip on it. In contrast, a landlord will happily see a monthly, monthly rental, as it lowers the number of months they have to deal with any form of search. This is understandable, as all they see is a lump sum amount of money. However, a landlord is also a business, which is why they may be charging a rent that is not ideal, but is a way to benefit the landlord. The answer is not to make a good dwelling for your tenant and try to cheat them out of a good deal, but instead it is to help them choose a home that they can settle in.

Although the First Amendment makes the right of free expression a constitutional fundamental right, the Supreme Court has yet to assert this legal protection and extend First Amendment protections to a wide range of new technologies. In the Digital Age, the technology and business practices associated with the Internet, social media and mobile devices are changing the way businesses operate and communicate. The following decision explored how the Supreme Court may address the evolving implications of these technologies on First Amendment protections. The Supreme Court has yet to assert the right of free expression in the context of the Internet, social media and mobile devices. However, courts are considering appropriate First Amendment limitations on speech in their review of laws and actions under the Communications Decency Act of 1996 (CDA) and the Child Online Protection Act. The Court considered such limitations in the context of the first Freedom of Information Act case to be decided by the Court: A M U.S.C. Glucksberg v. Fox (1997). There, the court addressed liability for intermediaries' publication of newsgroup messages sent by other users. Although the Court concluded that the application of the CDA to the defendants removed the First Amendment protections against liability for publishing defamatory statements, the court left the door open for asserting such rights. The court decided that the right of free speech applies to the Internet, but stressed that there is not the same legal protection as that afforded by the Constitution or the Bill of Rights. In the time since the Glucksberg decision, the Court has not considered First Amendment constraints on technological changes that impact the internet. The Court has used a functional understanding of the First Amendment to strike down "obscenity" and other messages considered harmful in various circumstances. The Court also has ruled that
